

Monkey business

A business owner who seeks unfair government policies for his business is neither a believer in free enterprise, nor a capitalist. He is a fascist.

Capital enables creativity.

Free enterprise allows competitors freely to contend for the customer's money.

Free markets are not free if burdened by government rules.

Fascist company owners are short on self confidence. They are controlling manipulators seeking to make up for their lack of skill.

An industrialist who gives large gifts to politicians, seeking favor, if he should enter a boxing ring, would know he had no muscle in the fight. He would assign his ten year old son to throw rotten eggs at his opponent.

In the same way, a business seeking unfair advantage from government is wimpish, a parasite not worthy of customers.
